THE KING AND I  June 18-29
Book and Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein II
Music by Richard Rodgers
Directed by Alan Rust

Based on Margaret Landon’s novel, Anna and the King of Siam, this Rodgers and Hammerstein masterpiece was originally created as a vehicle for Gertrude Lawrence. In 1862 a young British widow is summoned to Bangkok to serve as teacher and governess to the King’s many children. The conflicting cultural values of 19th century East and West create a profound backdrop for this unique and heart wrenching love story. Holly Holcomb and Matt Faucher return as Anna and the King.

AND THEN THERE WERE NONE  July 2-6
By Agatha Christie.
Directed by David Haugen

Agatha Christie’s classic thriller! Ten people with murky pasts are marooned on an island, brought together by a mysterious invitation and doomed to die one by one unless they can discover who among them is the murderer! This one will keep you guessing until the final curtain!

THE ODD COUPLE  July 9-13
By Neil Simon
Directed by Mary O’Brady

Neil Simon’s beloved comedy is the tale of two best friends, coping with the financial and emotional struggles of divorce in New York City. Based on Simon’s older brother and his best friend and originally played by Art Carney and Walter Matthau, when Felix and Oscar attempt to set up housekeeping, their daily routine, weekly poker game and foray into double dating ignite both fireworks and some of the funniest lines Simon ever wrote. The humanity beneath the hilarity is why this play continues to make audiences laugh all over the world.

HAY FEVER  July 16-20
By Noel Coward
Directed by Richard Mangan

Set in the country manse of captivating, but self-centered London stage star, Judith Bliss, her playwright husband and two grown children, when four guests, train in from London expecting relaxation, romance, and a touch of celebrity glamour they get far more than they bargained for. Coward combines screwball comedy with some of his wittiest drawing room repartee. You’ve never spent a weekend in the country quite like this one. Richard Mangan joins us from London to direct.

SHE LOVES ME  July 25-August 3
Music by Jerry Bock  & Lyrics by Sheldon Harnick
Book by Joe Masteroff
Directed by Jonathan Freeman

This charming story by Hungarian Playwright Miklos Laszlo has come to life in many versions, including the films The Little Shop Around the Corner and You’ve Got Mail but none more delightful than the 1963 Bock and Harnick musical gem by the creators of Fiddler on the Roof. The backdrop is Maraczek’s perfume shop in 1930’s Budapest. Alan Rust plays Mr. Maraczek and Kyle Brand returns to choreograph and play the head waiter, the role that earned director Jonathan Freeman a Tony nomination.

DEATH OF A SALESMAN  August 6-10
By Arthur Miller
Directed by Francesca James

For many people this is Arthur Miller’s greatest play. The Pulitzer Prize winning drama is the story of the struggling salesman, Willy Loman, who reaches for the American dream and, as that dream turns to personal nightmare, fails to see the salvation that is offered by a family’s love. Monomoy is proud to present one of the great classics of the American theater starring Terry Layman and Ellen Fiske.

ARSENIC AND OLD LACE
August 13-17
By Joseph Kesserling
Directed by Dennis Delaney

It is a truth universally acknowledged that old ladies are sweet, and none are sweeter than the Harper sisters who make such delicious elderberry wine from the old family recipe with ‘just a pinch’ of their secret ingredient! Made famous by the Frank Capra film version, with Cary Grant and Peter Lorre, Arsenic and Old Lace is another American classic, a deservedly famous black comedy about an hilariously dysfunctional family. Featuring Nora Chester.

SHAKESPEARE IN HOLLYWOOD
August 20-24
By Ken Ludwig
Directed by Dennis Predovic and Marsha Korb

In 1934 the famed European director, Max Reinhardt, directed a Hollywood film of Shakespeare’s A Midsummer Night’s Dream for Warner Brothers. That much is true, as is the fact that two of his biggest stars fell ill and delayed the production. Then suppose that the ‘real’ Puck and the ‘real’ Oberon turned up in Hollywood? And brought their magic with them? Lights, Camera, Mayhem!! Featuring Bernard Cornwell as Max Reinhardt and Nora Chester as Louella Parsons.

MEET the MONOMOY MAESTRO
by Mary O’Brady

One of the great joys for any theatregoer is that wonderful moment when the house goes dark, the stage or curtain begins to glow and the opening notes of the overture fill the room. Whether the melody is fondly familiar or a new discovery, in that instant we are transported by the music into the world of the play. Anyone who has attended the Monomoy Theatre in the last few years can attest to the quality of the orchestras for the season’s two musicals. Much of the credit for that goes to the skill, talent, and diligence of Monomoy’s current music director, Phil Rittner. Rittner spends the rest of the year as an adjunct faculty member at the University of Hartford’s Hartt School Theatre Division. FOMT proudly sponsors the orchestras each summer so we asked Phil to give us all a closer look at how the summer music of Monomoy is made.

MARY: Phil, everyone knows you as the conductor the orchestras but can you tell us more of what the music director’s job actually entails.

PHIL: It starts as soon as the shows are chosen. First, I research the orchestration of the show, and put together a dream orchestra in my head. Then, I have to consider the space we will be performing in, the kind of singing the show requires, the size of the chorus, etc. I also have to consider the number of available rooms in which to house players. Then, factoring in the number of rehearsals and performances and that year’s orchestra budget, I’m able to figure out how many musicians I will be able to hire. By this point, I know which instruments I’m going to want in the orchestra. I generally try to hire the musicians at least 6 months in advance, because I want to get the best, and they book summer work early.

MARY: How do you find musicians?

PHIL: Luckily, working at the Hartt School, which is one of the premier arts training programs in the country gives me access to some remarkable instrumentalists. Then, in the spring, Alan, or (as was the case this year) Alan and I fly to Ohio to audition the students there, and soon after we hold auditions in Hartford then cast the shows. When we finally get to June and rehearsals begin, I start by teaching the cast all the music in the score in the first few days. I also accompany the dance rehearsals and staging rehearsals.

MARY: So you rehearse all day, every day as the sole accompanist for the actors. As choreographer for 1776, I remember feeling guilty asking you play the same sections over and over while we worked out the “bumps.” Do you ever feel like a human CD player?

PHIL (Laughing) It’s part of the job. It’s during these rehearsals that I start to conduct the show in my head, so that when the orchestra gets here three days before we open, I already know how to communicate to them all the work that has been created in the tent.

MARY: We all know how tight the rehearsal schedule is at Monomoy. The actors only have two weeks but for the orchestra it’s far less than that.

PHIL: The musicians usually arrive three or four days before the show opens.

MARY: That’s not much time. Describe the process when the musicians finally arrive.

PHIL: During the afternoon three days before we open, we have the first orchestra rehearsal. We usually rehearse for about two hours, during which we read through the score for the first time as an ensemble. We take a break, and then have what we call “the sitzprobe,” which is the first time the cast sings through the show with the orchestra. For the next two days, we rehearse in the evenings at the dress rehearsals, and then we open!

MARY: In addition to the compressed timeframe what are some of the biggest challenges?

PHIL: Making sure the balance between the orchestra and cast is correct is crucial. Given the fact that we are such an intimate space, and there is no amplification, the balance of each show is different. As I have gotten to know the space, though, this has gotten easier. One of the easiest solutions is placing the orchestra offstage right, rather than in front of the stage allows us to play out without overwhelming the singers. However, that presents other challenges because I can’t see the actors and they can’t see me. For some shows, like 1776, it works well if we’re hidden. But for others, like Cabaret, we need to be a visible part of the show.

MARY: I remember some very peculiar sounds coming from that space off right during the irst orchestra rehearsal for 1776. It was followed by laughter and more than one groan from the musicians. What was going on there?

PHIL: Another challenge is deciphering the music we are sent. Historically, musicals have been put together a little slap-dash. Songs are in the show one night, then gone the next, characters come and go, writers, composers, choreographers, directors, and producers are replaced or hired to ‘doctor’ a show. All of these changes affect the score. Up until recently, all the scores rented from a publisher were hand written facsimiles of the score created during that hectic try-out process. They often have scribbled corrections in them. Some are missing bars, missing pages, and sometimes entire numbers. Sometimes instrumental parts in wrong key signatures, or are simply chock full of wrong notes. There have been times that I have spent almost an entire orchestra rehearsal simply figuring out what the right notes are supposed to be!

MARY: Last year, the final performance of Cabaret was canceled due to a power outage but an impromptu performance broke out on the patio.

PHIL: That night is possibly my favorite I’ve ever had in the theatre. Because we weren’t sure if the power would come back before the show or not, we all got into costume. Our trombone player, Matt Russo, stood on the patio and played for the crowd while we waited. By 8:20 it was clear we wouldn’t be able to do the show. Kyle Brand and I thought it was awful to send people away without at least a taste of something, so we gathered the male ensemble on the stairs in the courtyard, and they sang ‘Tomorrow Belongs to Me,’ a capella. As the actor playing the MC, Kyle began to do just that and introduced the characters. One by one, they came forward, and performed their numbers, choreography and all. The cast sang about half the score, unaccompanied, with cell phones and flashlights for illumination. It was a real ‘show must go on’ kind of night. When we were done, we took our makeup off, pointed our car headlights at the theatre, and struck the set in the dark. The power came back on just as we finished, of course!

MARY: You’ve spent several summers here in Chatham. What makes you want to come back?

PHIL: This theatre is an incredibly special place. There are very few real, old-fashioned summer theatres left in the country. They provide the best training a young theatre professional could hope for. This includes actors, singers, dancers, designers, tech folk, and musicians. It is a trial by fire kind of training that can’t be replicated in a classroom. That there is a place like Monomoy—located in such a special place and supported by such an active, generous, and embracing community—is a gift given to anyone who has had the privilege of working here.

In addition to his musical prowess, Rittner has other talents that indulge his perfectionist nature. In his ‘spare time’ he restores old houses. If you walk by the house next to the theatre where much of the company lives each summer, you’ll see the ground-level façade windows have been newly glazed. That too, is the work of our multi-faceted Monomoy Maestro.

ADOPT A MUSICIAN!

It takes 84 pounds of bamboo per day to feed a musician—no wait—that’s a giant panda. While musicians don’t need that much bamboo, they do need care and feeding. Funding the orchestras is a large part of FOMT’s contribution to the theatre season.

If you’d like to further support the FOMT orchestra by sponsoring a musician please indicate on the FOMT donation coupon and mail to:
